Child Blackmail: Do Not Stay Silent

Electronic blackmail comes in various forms

Children may face online blackmail through electronic games or social media platforms, such as:

Emotional Blackmail

The perpetrator requests photos, videos, or personal information from the child to manipulate their emotions and exert control

Ethical Blackmail

Requesting the child to perform unethical acts or any other actions they are unwilling to do, such as demands to meet in person.

Financial Blackmail

Asking the child to transfer money or send gifts to the blackmailer

Remember...

The perpetrator could be an adult or someone under 18.

How does blackmail occur?

The blackmailer gradually gets to know the child, often pretending to be of the same age.

1

They gather information about the child's interests and personal life.

2

They begin to build a close relationship step by step.

3

They collect photos and videos from the child.

4

Blackmail and threats begin by eroding the child's trust in their family.

3 Points to Remind Your Child When Using the Internet

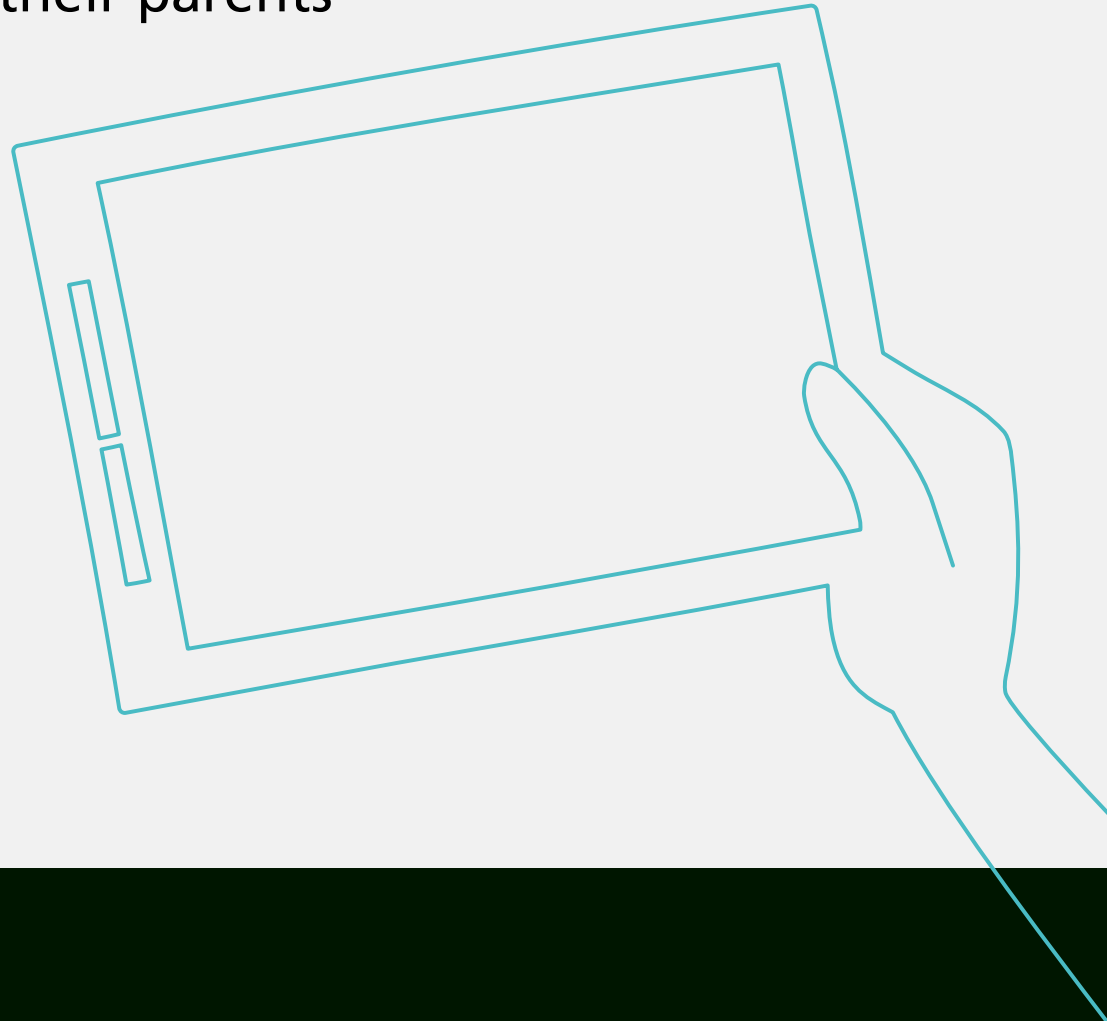

Define what is permissible to share online, ensuring it does not include personal photos from inside the home or of the child, nor inappropriate photos or videos, whether sent to relatives or strangers.

Emphasize the importance of privacy and avoiding the publication of personal information about the child or family, such as phone numbers, residential details, or schooling data.

Remember, blackmail is a crime, and children should promptly inform their parents to resolve the situation.

How to Protect Your Child from Blackmail?

Check the age rating of electronic games before purchasing.

Show interest and engage in the games your child plays.

Stay informed about what is used on the internet and who your child communicates with, and enable parental controls on their devices.

Remember

there are steps for a safe play environment for your child.

Set specific times for device use and explain this to your child.

Teach your child how to know if a camera is working or not.

Place the computer in an open area or common family space, not in the child's bedroom.

What if your child is subjected to blackmail.. How do you react?

Speak to your child gently and listen to them in order to review what happened and prevent it from recurring in the future.

Do not react harshly

avoid making the child feel guilty or threatened.

Stop communication with the blackmailer and block them, but do not delete the conversations.

Keep any evidence

such as chat logs containing requests and blackmail.

Change passwords

for all your child's accounts.

Report to the Cyber Crime Unit

in your country and to the electronic platform used.
